

News

Q1 Do you think things in this country are generally going in the right direction or do you feel things have gotten pretty seriously off on the wrong track?

	All Americans	Religious Affiliation					Catholics
	All Americans (A)	White evangelical Protestant (B)	White mainline Protestant (C)	Nonwhite Protestant (D)	Catholic (E)	Unaffiliated (F)	White Catholic (G)
Unweighted Sample Size	1,031	151	186	133	230	202	153
Right direction Column %	35%	61% CDEF	37% D	13%	39% DF	28% D	46%
Wrong track Column %	64%	38%	62% B	87% BCEF	61% B	72% BCE	54%
Refused Column %	1%	1%	1%	0%	0%	0%	1%

Do you think things in this country are generally going in the right direction or do you feel things have gotten pretty seriously off on the wrong track? (Courtesy PRRI)

Yonat Shimron

View Author Profile

Religion News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

July 19, 2018

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

A new poll conducted by the Public Religion Research Institute and The Atlantic shows that when it comes to politics, white evangelical Christians stand apart from every other religious group.

The poll found that 61 percent of evangelicals say the United States is headed in the right direction. By comparison, 64 percent of the overall public — including majorities of other Christian groups as well as religiously unaffiliated Americans — believes the country is seriously off track.

"White evangelical Protestants are sitting in their own unique space in the religious landscape on a whole range of issues," said Robert Jones, the CEO of PRRI.

The survey, conducted in June from among 1,000 people, asked questions about voting and political engagement. But it also broke down respondents' answers based on religious affiliation: white evangelical, white mainline Protestant, nonwhite Protestant, Catholic and religiously unaffiliated.

It's no surprise white evangelicals are happy with the country's overall direction. An overwhelming 81 percent of white evangelicals voted for President Trump and they have generally stuck by him during his first 18 months as president.

Trump's nomination of Judge Brett Kavanaugh to fill the seat of retiring Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy was widely hailed by evangelicals. And just last week, Robert Jeffress, one of Trump's informal evangelical advisers and the pastor of First Baptist Church in Dallas, called for an end to Robert Mueller's investigation of possible collusion between the Russian government and the Trump campaign during the 2016 presidential election.

The PRRI poll showed 77 percent of white evangelicals view Trump favorably or mostly favorably, the highest percentage since the 2016 election. By comparison, 17 percent of non-white Protestants, a group made up of African-Americans and Hispanics, viewed Trump favorably or mostly favorably.

As a group, white evangelicals were also the least likely to view America's changing racial demographic makeup positively. Fifty-two percent of white evangelicals said they felt negatively about the prospect that nonwhites would become the majority of the population by 2043. That fits with white evangelicals' approach to immigration, their distrust of Muslims and support for a border wall with Mexico. By comparison, all other religious groups in the survey viewed the changing demographics in mostly positive terms.

"I argued that white evangelical voters have really shifted from being values voters to being what I call 'nostalgia voters,' " said Jones. "They're voting to protect a past view of America that they feel is slipping away. That's driving evangelical politics much more than the old culture-war dynamics."

Brantley Gasaway, a professor of American religious studies at Bucknell University in Lewisburg, Pa., said white evangelicals' fears about the nation's growing racial diversity might be linked to their perception of religious diversity.

"They perceive that America becoming less white means America will become less Christian," he said. "I don't think that's true. Many Latino immigrants are coming from predominantly Christian nations. But they perceive changes in racial demographics as being a threat to the predominance of Christians in the United States."

Advertisement

As a group, white evangelicals are declining. A decade ago they made up 23 percent of the U.S. population; today it's more like 15 percent, Jones said. But they have an outsize influence at the ballot box because they tend to vote in high numbers.

The one area where religious groups appeared united is in their support for legislation that would make it easier to vote — measures such as same-day voter registration and restoring voting rights for people convicted of felonies.

A majority of all religious groups, with the exception of nonwhite Protestants, saw media bias as a "major problem." White evangelicals led the pack, with 79 percent saying media bias was a major problem. By contrast, 50 percent of religiously unaffiliated also said it was a major problem.

And while most religious groups said they would prefer that presidential elections be decided by the national popular vote as opposed to the Electoral College, white evangelicals once again stood out: 52 percent said presidential elections should be decided by the Electoral College. (Trump won the Electoral College but lost the popular vote.)

Rob McCoy, a pastor and city councilman in Thousand Oaks, Calif., is active in a group called the American Renewal Project, which encourages clergy to run for office. He said white evangelicals will defend their values.

"They don't waver from it," he said. "It may not be popular, but it still is what they hold to. They are who they are."

The margin of error for the national survey was plus or minus 3.3 percentage points.