

Displaced people flee after fires broke out at the Moria refugee camp on the island of Lesbos, Greece, Sept. 9, 2020. The camp, which was mostly destroyed, was home to at least 12,000 people, six times its maximum capacity of just over 2,000 asylum-seekers.(CNS photo/Reuters/Alkis Konstantinidis)

Cindy Wooden

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Vatican City — September 10, 2020

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Hours after a fire or fires sent thousands of migrants and refugees fleeing their tents and makeshift container homes at the Moria camp on the Greek island of Lesbos, a close aide to Pope Francis called for the permanent resettlement of all the residents.

"Since the time of the visit of the Holy Father (in 2016), we have been asking them to empty these concentration camps, but they let us take only the small groups that we have brought to Italy at the Vatican's expense in collaboration with the Community of Sant'Egidio," said Cardinal Konrad Krajewski, the papal almoner.

Asked about the fire, the cardinal, who has visited the Moria camp several times and accompanied small groups of asylum-seekers to Rome, told Catholic News Service that "sooner or later it was bound to happen."

"The refugees who entered Europe" by arriving in Greece, but have been stuck in overcrowded camps there, "are at the limit of supporting such an inhuman situation," the cardinal said. "It's like their hope is being killed."

While government officials said they were investigating the cause of the fire, the Greek news agency ANA said it broke out "at 2 a.m. after clashes began when some of the 35 refugees who tested positive for COVID-19 refused to move into isolation with their families."

The Moria camp was built to house just over 2,000 asylum-seekers, but according to the U.N. Refugee Agency, when the fire broke out, the camp housed more than 12,000 asylum-seekers, "including more than 4,000 children as well as other vulnerable groups, including 407 unaccompanied children, pregnant women and elderly people."

While many were given shelter in portable containers, thousands of others lived in tents on a hillside olive grove.

Daniela Pompei, who coordinates the refugee-resettlement program of the Sant'Egidio Community, told CNS Sept. 9 that she had been in contact that morning with many of the asylum-seekers at the camp.

"The situation is dramatic," she said. "Our refugee friends in Moria are desperate" as most of the 12,000 people who were in the camp are now on the road leading to the sea. Local media were reporting that the Greek police and nearby residents were preventing the asylum seekers from moving into town.

Pompei said it is necessary to find immediate housing at least for the families with children and other vulnerable people and to feed all of them.

"They must set up structures quickly with military tents or use hotels if possible," she said. "But even more importantly, they must transfer people to the mainland."

As Pope Francis has said repeatedly, as part of the European Union, Greece—and Italy and Malta as well—cannot be expected to enforce Europe's borders and its refugee policies alone.

Other nations must "accept the transfer of family groups and unaccompanied minors," Pompei said. "It is necessary to help Greece and, particularly, to help the asylum seekers who are mainly Syrians, Afghans, Congolese and Cameroonians."

Advertisement