

News

A mother from Guatemala seeking asylum in the U.S. kisses her 3-month-old baby while waiting to be escorted by Border Patrol agents in Roma, Texas, April 7, 2021, after crossing the Rio Grande into the United States. (CNS/Reuters/Go Nakamura)

Mark Pattison

View Author Profile

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Washington — April 9, 2021

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

An interfaith collection of religious activists is asking the Biden administration to step up the pace of family reunification to remedy the Trump administration's "zero tolerance" policy that separated an estimated 5,500 immigrant children from their families by invoking criminal proceedings against their parents.

"While we have a new administration and it's a new day, injustice persists," said the Rev. Jennifer Butler, a Presbyterian minister and CEO of Faith in Public Life, which organized the April 7 online event, "Our Holy Season Prayer: Reunite All Families."

"The work of reunion is incomplete, so we are once again speaking out," she added.

The event's centerpiece was a five-point plan for the administration:

- Find the missing parents, reunite all the families and ensure they can live in the U.S. together, free from detention and deportation.
- Provide immediate protections from deportation and support a path to citizenship for all separated families.
- Establish resources and redress funds that includes coverage of trauma and mental health services.
- Make systemic changes to end family separations for good.
- And pursue investigations of, and accountability for, those responsible.

"I will never forget watching a long line of migrant families come over from the detention center" to a respite center run by Sr. Norma Pimentel, a Missionary of Jesus, and administered by Catholic Charities of the Rio Grande Valley in Texas, Butler recalled. "They had just been released. They were sick and they were starving."

Butler's voice choked with emotion as she remembered seeing "a boy riding on the shoulders of his father. He reminded me of my own son, tall and lanky. He was doubled over. I couldn't see his face. I stared at the boy, I watched him and I prayed for him."

Then, she said, "volunteers out front cheered and applauded, and the boy lifted his head, smiled ear to ear and began to wave vigorously. For the first time in weeks, he was being treated as a human being."

Later, "I saw the motto above Sr. Norma's door: 'Restoring human dignity,'" Butler said, repeating it for emphasis. "That is the nation we want to create. That is the nation that we are fighting for."

A migrant family seeking asylum in the U.S. waits to be transported by the Border Patrol in La Joya, Texas, April 7, 2021, after crossing the Rio Grande into the United States. (CNS/Reuters/Go Nakamura)

Pimentel, scheduled to speak, was unable to do so due to an emergency at the Catholic Charities respite center in Brownsville, Texas, according to Jose Arnulfo Cabrera, director of education and advocacy for the Ignatian Solidarity Network.

"She works every day," he said of Pimentel. "As crazy as everything has been at the border, her absence is also a reminder to us of all that craziness at the border — having to deal with CBP [U.S. Customs and Border Protection] and all of their policies."

The event's theme took note of the Abrahamic faiths' concurrent feast this year: Christians celebrated Easter April 4 — as the Jewish Passover was concluding — and Muslims begin the monthlong observance of Ramadan at sunset April 12.

When Justice Department officials announced the zero-tolerance policy in 2018, they "absolutely knew they would be separating families," said Yesenia Chavez, an immigrant rights policy analyst for the American Civil Liberties Union.

"This deterrence measure did not work," Chavez said, adding, "This is a moral stain on our country's history."

In interviews with ACLU attorneys after being detained by immigration authorities, the immigrants said "they would have still had no option but to come to this country because they were fleeing violence and trying to stay alive," Chavez said. "They have specifically stated to our representatives, 'My family was in danger of being killed — either myself or my children.' People are coming to this country for respite and being able to live freely."

Ramadan requires fasting during daylight hours, and fasting "requires self-control and God-consciousness, including social consciousness," said Imam Ali Siddiqui, an Islamic teacher, chaplain, family counselor and youth adviser in California.

"Social consciousness is on the top of the list to become aware of the plight of the poor," Imam Siddiqui said, "and the migrant who is in dire need of our help."

Ramadan, he added, "is also the month of justice and blessing," and any delay in the reunification of families separated at the border "means continued injustice."

Condemning "the evil of family separation and the horror it brings to parent and child," the Rev. Traci Blackmon of the United Church of Christ said, "I cannot stand in the shadow of an empty tomb that represents the hope of my faith while also standing in the shadow of an empty cross that reminds me of the horrors of humanity."

Blackmon, associate general minister of justice and local church ministries for her denomination, said Jesus, while on the cross, "took time to ensure the care of his mother before his death. Jesus was teaching us all of our responsibility to care for one another."

Catholic co-sponsors of the event included the Columban Center for Advocacy and Outreach; the U.S. provinces of the Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd; the Franciscan Action Network; the Leadership Conference of Women Religious; the Maryknoll Office for Global Concerns; the National Advocacy Center of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd; and the U.S.-Canada province of the Society of the Sacred Heart.

Advertisement