

News

A crucifix is seen at Ss. Simon and Jude Cathedral in Pheonix May 10. Now retired Bishop Thomas J. Olmsted led a prayer vigil at the cathedral to end capital punishment. A day later Clarence Dixon was executed in Florence, Ariz., for his murder conviction in the 1978 killing of Deana Bowdoin, a 21-year-old Arizona State University student. On June 8, Frank Atwood died by lethal injection for his murder conviction in the 1984 killing of 8-year-old Vicki Lynne Hoskinsonan. (CNS/Courtesy of Diocese of Phoenix)

Carol Zimmermann

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Washington — June 10, 2022

Share on BlueskyShare on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

Arizona's Catholic bishops and other Catholic opponents of the death penalty spoke out against the June 8 execution of Frank Atwood, just as they did for the May 11 execution of Clarence Dixon, another Arizona death-row prisoner.

The two executions by lethal injection took place at the state prison in Florence, Arizona, following a nearly eight-year pause in executions in the state because of the difficulty of obtaining lethal injection drugs and criticism that a 2014 execution in the state was botched.

Atwood, 65, faced the death penalty for his conviction in the 1984 murder of an 8-year-old girl. Dixon, 66, was sentenced to death for his conviction in the 1978 murder of a 21-year-old Arizona State University student.

The U.S. Supreme Court denied final appeals by attorneys for both inmates, which allowed their executions to move forward.

In late March, Arizona officials announced the state would resume executions.

'Death is not the answer to death and executions are not justice.'

—Catholic Mobilizing Network

Tweet this

"Unfortunately, once these executions begin, it is likely many more will come in relatively quick succession," the Arizona Catholic Conference said in a May 2 statement.

The state's bishops said they remain steadfast in their "continued opposition to the death penalty, especially in this modern era," a stand they said is "united with Pope Francis, who has advocated for a global end to capital punishment."

The day before Dixon's execution, now-retired Phoenix Bishop Thomas J. Olmsted led a prayer vigil at Ss. Simon and Jude Cathedral in Phoenix praying for an end to the death penalty.

"The church has the deepest compassion for those victimized by brutal crimes as well as their families," the bishop told the congregation at the vigil. "We need always to pray for healing for all those affected by these crimes (but) we believe that all human life, each human person, from conception to death, is sacred."

"Even a murderer is not outside the infinite mercy of God. The possibility of true repentance and salvation remains for every person as long as he is still alive," he added.

He closed his homily with prayers that Dixon "may die with a contrite and repentant heart."

Witnesses to Dixon's execution said there was no expression of repentance, no words of remorse.

Advertisement

Mike Phelan, director of the Diocese of Phoenix's Office of Marriage and Respect Life, told The Catholic Sun, the news outlet of the Diocese of Phoenix, that capital punishment is a difficult issue for some Catholics as well as some people outside the faith.

"I do think people struggle with this issue, particularly if they have been impacted in their family or know someone who has been impacted in their family by a heinous crime," he said, "because we do have this sense of justice, and how do you balance the scales of justice when there has been a horrible, intentional evil (committed)."

"I think there is some difficulty about this among Catholics because we don't want to violate justice when we argue for mercy," he said.

Arizona stopped carrying out death sentences in 2014, after the execution of Joseph Wood, who was put to death using a two-drug injection mixture that took over two hours. In 2017, the state's plan to improve the process was accepted by a federal judge, clearing the way for executions to resume.

Critics said Dixon's execution also was botched, as it took nearly two hours due to the difficulty of inserting an IV into his veins.

In response to Dixon and Atwood's executions, Catholic Mobilizing Network issued separate tweets saying they "mourn this unnecessary loss of life. Death is not the answer to death and executions are not justice."

The group also acknowledged the victims and their families and prayed for their healing.

Related: Supreme Court sides with Arizona in death penalty cases

Sr. Helen Prejean, a Sister of St. Joseph of Medaille, who is a longtime opponent of capital punishment, posted Twitter threads about both executions.

She said that even though Dixon's "history of mental illness was well-known to the state, the judge in his death penalty case allowed him to fire his court-appointed public defender and represent himself at trial."

Regarding Atwood, she said his sentence was "based on an incorrect interpretation of the law without any evidence to support that interpretation. But for these errors, Frank would not be facing execution today."

"What does it say about our legal system when courts refuse to consider a clear error that resulted in an invalid death sentence? It is a system of technical rules and regulations that are almost always enforced to the detriment of vulnerable and disempowered people," she tweeted.

[Contributing to this report was Jeff Grant, who writes for The Catholic Sun, the news outlet of the Diocese of Phoenix.]